especially of the middle classes, who were encouraged to think that the young Prince when he came to the throne would set upon more liberal principles than his father had done, and would free the people at last from the yoke of despotism which they bore. Though they did not dare express their wishes openly, it was probably due to no extent to the breaking out of the Orfoman war, in 1853, that the popular desire for liberty which was already simmering near the surface, was cooled down, or directed into other channels, for the people answered to the call made upon their patriotism with the greatest possible ardour; and the appearance of Russia as a military nation, and the success of her Muscovite troops received a rude check. Their fleets were compelled to take shelter under the guns of the stone fortresses of Cronstadt, and Sebastopol, and the battles of the Alma, Balaklava, Inkermann, Raparatori, and Silistria, proved that the soldiers of the Czar were unable to resist the united power of the British, French, and Sardinian armaments. Russia, too, was disappointed. The nation had expected everything of the Government, and the Crimean war appeared as an immense bankruptcy of authority." The popular voice could no longer be stifled; men met in secret, and uttered charges of corruption against the high officials of the State; secret pamphlets were printed and distributed, in which those charges were repeated, and until the Russian army and navy, gathered round the yoke of the tyrant Czar, Nicholas, however, denied not this ebullition of the popular feeling, though he added to it; but it is probable that these intestine troubles, aided by his military failures, helped to break down his iron constitution. During the latter end of February, 1865, he became dangerously ill, and felt that he was dying. He gave his instructions to his heir with composure, and on the following day he died.

Alexander II. was 37 years of age when he became Czar of all the Russias, and immediately on his accession a general feeling was noticed throughout Europe that peace would shortly ensue. The first notes of Alexander did not, however, tend to confirm this pacific feeling; for he put forth a proclamation declaring that he would endeavour to accomplish the assassination of his uncle, Peter the Great's son, Peter, Catherine Alexander, and his father, Nicholas. Some abortive attempts to settle the terms of peace were made, but in the meantime the siege of Sebastopol went on, and on the 8th September, 1855, it was taken by the Allied Powers. Alexander even now did not seem inclined to submit; he encouraged the army with his presence, and it is even said that he fought with the gallantry of a fallen city commander. The lingering on from month to month of peace was eventually signed on the 30th March, 1856.

In a manifesto which Alexander put forward to announce to his people the termination of the war he expressed his opinion that by the combined efforts of the Government and the nation great reforms would be effected in every direction. The widest hopes were now excited in the breasts of those of the people who were long oppressed, and men began to speak their minds freely. But even in Russia they dared not tell the whole truth, and it was left for an exile, named Herzen, in London, to expose in the most fearless manner the dishonesty and corruption of officials in high places. The publication which Herzen put forth was called Kokozki, or the Bazaar of Lies; it was prohibited in Russia, but it had, nevertheless, a wide circulation all over the empire, and copies of it regularly found their way to the Emperor, who thus learned of official iniquities which he had never before dreamed of, and which there is no doubt he earnestly desired to root out. But there was one large measure of social reform that was needed almost before anything else—namely, the emancipation of the serfs. It was determined to achieve—the emancipation of the serfs. At the time now referred to there were more than 47 millions of serfs in Russia, of whom 20 millions were Crown peasants. Those last were already substantially free, owing to reforms that had been gradually going on for many years. But the position of the serfs belonging to private owners was very different. They were treated as slaves, and given them their freedom, and at the same time to provide them with the means of getting their livelihood, was a difficult problem. The institution of serfdom in Russia was very peculiar; they were attached to the soil, which they considered theirs while, at the same time, they themselves were the property of the noble; and in different parts of the empire the conditions of serfdom were entirely different. It was not until March, 1861, that the Emperor was able to carry out his cherished wish of liberating the serfs, and establishing them in a new condition where they would have an opportunity of testing the principles of liberty. The experiment was not at first so successful as the Emperor desired; neither the nobles nor the serfs were satisfied with the new state of things, and in some districts there was bloodshed before the new system could be enforced. Other reforms of political nature, affecting chiefly the upper and middle classes, followed, and a certain amount of freedom was given to the Press.

Whatever the good intentions of a monarch may be unless he be able to carry out the reforms which the nation earnestly calls for, his influence will be of little value. In spite of the unquestionable benefits which have been conferred upon the country," wrote an English journal last year in an article upon the revolutionary spirit existing in Russia some years ago, "of the reforms which had put an end to most of the abuses likely to injure ordinary members of society, there was much dissatisfaction in Russia. Even at the present moment, each other on the advent of a political millennium, causes were secreted at work which gradually produced in some quarters a deeply rooted discontent. They manifested themselves at times by outbreaks to which but little attention was paid, by student disturbances, incendiary fires. It was supposed that these phenomena were temporary, and might disappear if the government had but been sufficient to remove the unhealthy root of the body politic to which they bore witness. But time passed on it became clear that the disease which they were symptoms had acquired a strong hold upon certain classes of Russian society, and the question arose how it was to be treated. At this time the Emperor had himself passed through a considerable illness, and his physicians had pronounced him fit to resume his duties. His schemes of reform, his hereditary predilection towards melancholy strengthened by the plots and rumours of plots of which he was perpetually being informed, and at length intensified by repeated attempts upon his life, he succumbed to the wishes of those among his councillors who were in favour of repressive reactionary measures. The result was that the government has been obliged to concede what he desired a change in the general administration of affairs, and recourse was had to rigorous measures. In order that the revolutionary fire that was smouldering might be quickly and effectually extinguished. "The suit of policy," says the article from which we have already quoted, "has been that the Government has lost the sympathy and the support of moderate men who have been qualified the ardent of those who have extreme opinions."

The methods by which the secret societies have propagated their doctrines have been manifold, and some of the proceedings of the conspirators are set forth very clearly in the following interesting extract—"We see, for instance, a little band of enthusiasts living in manufacturing towns, wear the dress of the common people, inhabit miserable huts, and in the evening attempt to gain the confidence of their fellow-workers. They are mostly the sons of priests, or of Government clerks, or of small proprietors, many of them are students here and there may be found a man of rank like Prince Kraptovkin, who made so serious an error of judgment as to believe that he could bring about a revolution. But the greater part belong to the lower middle class—one which in Russia is not large. To women appear to be somewhat superior to men on whom they associate, many of them beloved daughters of landed proprietors, or of civil servants, and good family. Clad in common attire, gowns and boots, adorned without apparent manner with vulgar ornaments, they go abroad without any disguise, and assume the task of educating up to instruction to the workmen, people among whom they dwell. When a little group of such acquaintances has gathered together, and their minds have been rendered receptive to the conversation,

NEWS FROM THE ENGLISH MAIL, VIA SAN FRANCISCO.

The R. M. S. City of Sydney arrived from San Francisco via Auckland at 3.30 p.m. yesterday afternoon. Her dates are—London 27th January, and San Francisco 15th February. We take the following telegraphic intelligence from the "Francia" papers to hand:—

GREAT BRITAIN.

London, Feb. 14.—The Chinese Treaty with the United States excited uneasiness in China, in reviving treaties, should prohibit the importation of opium, and pointing to American Treaty as precedent.

There has been no injury to property, and innumerable casualties at sea by heavy gales.

Twelve inches of snow in London impeded the traffic.

The funeral of another actor, was only attended by a few friends, another actor reading the service for the dead. Southern was an avowed infidel. He left all his property to his sister.

It is rumored that Mr. Gladstone will shortly be made a peer at Lord Liverpool.

20,000 miners attended a meeting at Leigh, Lancashire; they afterwards went to Altherton colliery and created a desperate riot. Miners, infantry, and police charged the mob. Several of the miners and police were seriously injured.

Reid, Leppard, and Co. coffee merchants, Frankfurt, with branches in London, have failed. The coffee trade generally is depressed.

Mr. Gladstone's residence and person have been placed under police protection, fearing a Fenian attack.

Great excitement is being used in all parts of the Kingdom, especially at the House of Commons. Three policemen were shot at Edinburgh in arresting two men for a riotous assembly. One of the prisoners committed suicide. The Irish Land League has invested £70,000 accumulated funds in American securities.
